Heartened by a good night's sleep, Alex walks around the top floor of the house, trying to figure out the name of his caring host. In the man's room he finds a copy of "A Clockwork Orange," by F. Alexander. He begins to leaf through F. Alexander's book, though he understands little of what he reads. As far as he can glean from the somewhat overwrought prose, F. Alexander thinks of people as fruit that grow on a great tree planted by God, and that God needs those people to slake his ...
