It's difficult to know what to say or do for a friend or family member who has a terminal illness. Experts suggest that you don't say, "It's going to be OK." Make it clear you are there for them, try to create a semblance of normalcy, ask how they are feeling today, and be a good listener.

What to Say to a Dying Friend, Someone Who's Sick

Many patients going through the dying process may experience a phenomenon known as "nearing death awareness." This is a special knowledge that a dying person has that death is near. Often times this awareness is overlooked by the patient's loved ones and health care providers and may even be mistaken for delirium or terminal restlessness.

The Phenomena of Nearing Death Awareness

The dying process usually begins well before death actually occurs, and understanding this process can sometimes help you recognize when your loved one is dying. There are changes that take place physically, behaviorally, and psychologically in the journey towards death, that are signs that the end of life may be nearing.

How to Recognize When Your Loved One Is Dying

Next, just have normal conversations with your friend as you would if they were not dying. You really don't want to talk about the bad stuff unless they bring it up in a conversation. I strongly agree with anyone who would say to let your friend take the lead in the conversation about the bad stuff, because this is exactly what I would do.

I am at a loss as to what to say to my dying friend ...

Diagnosing dying (the last hours or days of life) In order to care for dying patients it is essential to "diagnose dying" (figure). 7 However, diagnosing dying is often a complex process. In a hospital setting, where the culture is often focused on "cure," continuation of invasive procedures, investigations, and treatments may be pursued at the expense of the comfort of the patient.
