This is the latest updated edition of the University of Cambridge's official statutes and Ordinances.

This survey gives an indication of how best to address the teaching of economics and personal finance in our nation. It must be state-by-state, because that is where curriculum decisions are made. The federal government must encourage states to place economic and personal finance education not only into state standards, but into the core curriculum. This report looks at the national picture and sees where we are succeeding and where we need more attention. Tables and maps.

This book shows, we believe, the breadth and the complexity of issues that economists now tackle in their analysis of the connections between the ecosystem and the economic system. The book offers contributions to such disparate issues as the value of preserving the wolf in Sweden and the proper distribution of permits in an effective global warming treaty. Because these questions remain at the fore front of important resource allocation problems that need to be confronted, it is only appropriate that they are represented in a book that intends to paint a picture, albeit certainly incomplete, of the vibrant and progressing state of environmental economics. The contributions cover five areas of environmental economics: policy instruments, cost-benefit analysis, cost-efficiency, contingent valuation and experimental economics. Each area is worthy of a book by itself, but here we have made a point of focusing on problems that seem directly applicable to the pressing policy issues of today. Thus, the contributors address topics that are directly relevant to international and regional policy making, as well as those that are linked to development of supporting information systems (e.g. resource accounting). In addition, the contributions seek to provide high-level applications of measurement techniques as well as pertinent critiques of these methods. The next section provides a summary overview of the book.

Economic literacy is recognized as a deficit quality in the United States, no more prevalent than during the last great recession. It is paramount the K-12 educational system lead the movement to educate the public on economic content and issues, as it is the one institution that has direct contact with all citizens. The question then must be asked, how economic literate are teachers entrusted with the responsibility of imparting economic knowledge to his/her K-12 grade level student. A sample of Arkansas teachers at each grade level K -- 12 were tested using national normed economic literacy tests designed to test the economic knowledge of their respective grade level student. Using multiple regression, one-way and factorial ANOVA, and one-way MANOVA to analyze the data, a picture of both economic knowledge and teacher human capital investment in economics emerged. Teacher data were analyzed using a composite score, an economic content score, and scores on each of the twenty voluntary national content standards in economics as defined by the Council for Economic Education. A correlation of the voluntary national content standards in economics to Arkansas social studies curriculum frameworks allowed for analysis of Arkansas teachers' mastery on content set forth in the curriculum standards. Elementary teachers were best prepared to cover their grade level economic curriculum content and high school teachers the least prepared whether the high school content was taught in a stand-alone class or infused into another social studies course. The number of professional workshops attended were the best predictor of success on the grade level economic literacy test. Recommendations discussed include economic educational preparation of socials studies teachers and grade specific professional development workshops accompanied by pedagogical techniques.
