 One of the most powerful words in modern architectural criticism is that of 'pastiche'. In one of its senses, a building is a pastiche if it exhibits one or more established styles in a jumbled way, either due to incompetence or to some kind of playfulness. This is a useful concept, which picks out an important feature of many buildings.

Written in 1957 in Italian under the title Amate l'architettura ("Love Architecture"), this book was dedicated "not to architects, but to people falling in love with architecture." During his long life, Gio Ponti never wavered in his conviction that people can learn to read and love architecture.
