How to Make a Drama Series: 7 Steps (with Pictures) - wiki-How

By the time you have written your Treatment, written a cracking Pilot and possibly produced a series outline in order to express your character arcs across the duration of the series, you will be a good way into these five, and be aware that there may not be an occasion whereby you will need to produce all five, but I have them here for you to reference when and if it's necessary, in order to keep the conversation going between you and a potential Producer.

Pamela Douglas is an award-winning writer with numerous credits in television drama. In addition to previous editions of this book, she is also the author of The Future of Television: Your Guide to Creating TV in the New World (MWP 2015).

End your script around 30 or 60 pages depending on the format you're writing. A page of a script usually equals about 1 minute of screen time. If you're working on a 30-minute comedy, aim to reach between 30-35 pages by the end of your script. If you're writing a 1-hour drama, then finish your script so it's between 60-70 pages.

Usually, scripts for drama series are around 60 pages, though a fast-talking show like The West Wing sometimes went to 70 pages. On networks that break shows (for example Lost) into five acts plus a teaser, writers are stuck with reduced screen time, and find themselves with eight page acts and scripts coming in around 48 pages. Each script is timed before production, and if it runs long (despite the page count), the writer needs to know what to trim in dialogue or which action to ellipsis ...

Writing a TV comedy, or sitcom, is a different process from writing a TV drama. Here's what makes them different: Tone. TV sitcoms are funny, tackle lighthearted topics, and intend to make viewers laugh. Dramas are more serious and take time to develop a story rather than telling jokes. Story Arc and Pace. Sitcoms have a quick narrative pace, they focus on the build to the climax, have less act breaks, and introduce the conflict before the end of act one.
